

Always Productive

Weekly Report 1/22/17 to 1/28/17

Just when I thought the stress of finishing my original work was finally over, I was tasked with also having to submit my documentation for my original work at the beginning of the week while also having to finish and submit my original work assessment at the end of the week. When first starting my assessment, I was left at a blank with almost no idea what to do except only a general idea and outline of what to put on the page. However, as I began to actually start doing the work and start typing, I found that the words simply kept flowing allowed me to continue typing freely about the culmination of hours and work put into ISM so far. Throughout my assessment I tried to describe every detail about my original work, my research, and my various observations during the creation and analysis process. During the week I worked diligently on my assessment, but not without also focusing heavily on contacting various professionals who could possibly become my mentor but once again to no avail. At this point in time, I plan to focus more on the past interviewees I have already met with and try asking one of them to be my mentor rather than continue the seemingly futile search for the “perfect professional”. With every deadline creeping closer and closer until both my final product and final presentation are due, I will still continue in the mentor search until I can find someone fitting to aid me in the creation of a final product.
